Legislator Anker Recognizes Rocky Point Historical Society

Members of the Rocky Point Historical Society are recognized by Legislator Anker at the April 23 general meeting.

Riverhead, NY, April 2013 – Suffolk County Legislator Sarah Anker recognized the Rocky Point Historical Society for their efforts in preserving the oldest home standing in Rocky Point, the Noah Hallock House.

Through the generosity of community supporters, as well as a county grant sponsored by Legislator Anker, the home will be maintained and preserved as a vital part of local and national history.

“The Hallock House is a rare piece of historical property that has maintained its original character and charm,” said Legislator Anker. “Through the Historical Society’s tireless efforts, the home has been saved. It will remain a cultural center and museum for future generations to enjoy.”

The two-story house is nearly 300 years old and has been largely untouched since it was built by prominent resident Noah Hallock. The house will serve as a historic museum, educational center, and will also provide historic field trip programs to schools and groups. Additionally, the Historical Society has received many artifacts from the Hallock family, including archival photographs, letters, books, clothing, farm equipment and furniture which will be displayed as part of the museum.
